What We're Reading This Month

Jennifer at South is reading:

On the eve of his father's release from a 15 year long wrongful incarceration, Alfonso Jones is gunned down in a department store by a police officer who mistakes the coat-hanger Alfonso is holding for a handgun. Though the specifics are fictional they take their inspiration from several of the incidents which lead to the creation of the Black Lives Matter movement, and the historical facts of some of these tragedies are interwoven with the imagined tragedy of Alfonso, who wakes up from his senseless death to find himself trapped on an endless spiritual subway, destined to revisit moments from his life and death until justice is served. Medina's juxtaposition of Jones's story with that of real life victims through constant cross-cutting reinforces that this is less a single death than just another stop on a long, tragic line. It's an ambitious approach that's occasionally difficult to follow, making for an achingly imperfect book in which the importance of the issues nonetheless outweighs any issues with its execution.

Lisa at Deerwood is reading:

Written and illustrated by author/artist Thi Bui, this bestselling graphic novel was included in the American Library Association's 2018 Notable Books list for nonfiction. On the occasion of her own child's birth, Thi Bui reflects on her complicated relationship with her own discomforting parents-both Vietnamese "boat people" who immigrated to the United States. A limited palette in shades of orange and black fits the book's serious tone. Researching her parents' difficult past in war-torn Vietnam, Bui gains a greater understanding and appreciation of parenthood.
